IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

CLINTON REILLY,

No. C-00-0119-VRW

Plaintiff,

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

v.

THE HEARST CORPORATION and THE CHRONICLE PUBLISHING COMPANY,

Defendants.

In this private antitrust case, plaintiff challenges two transactions involving the general circulation daily newspapers in San Francisco. The publishers of the city's two major dailies have reached an agreement pursuant to which Hearst Corporation, publisher of the San Francisco Examiner, will acquire Chronicle Publishing Corporation's San Francisco Chronicle. The antitrust ramifications of this transaction and a companion deal involving the future of the Examiner were the subject of a trial to the court on May 1-5, 9-12 and 15. The court now makes its findings of fact and draws conclusions of law.

1 PARTIES

2 Plaintiff Clint Reilly is a real estate investor, former 3 professional political campaign manager/consultant and unsuccessful 4 candidate for mayor of San Francisco in the 1999 municipal 5 elections. Reilly is a subscriber to the San Francisco Chronicle
6 newspaper and a purchaser of single copies of the San Francisco
7 Examiner newspaper.

8 Defendant The Hearst Corporation (Hearst) is a New York
9 City-based media company engaged in newspaper, magazine and book 10 publishing, television broadcasting and ranching, among other 11 businesses. Hearst was founded in 1887 by William Randolph Hearst 12 and, through trusts, is owned by his descendants. Hearst is 13 publisher of the San Francisco Examiner newspaper.

14 Defendant The Chronicle Publishing Company (CPC) is a 15 Nevada corporation headquartered in San Francisco. At all relevant 16 times, CPC was publisher of the San Francisco Chronicle newspaper, 17 licensee of KRON-TV, a television station in San Francisco
18 affiliated with the NBC television network, and operator of Bay TV, 19 a cable television station. CPC also until recently engaged in 20 book publishing and owned newspapers in Bloomington, IL, and 21 Worcester, MA. CPC is owned by the descendants of Michael H de 22 Young who, along with his brother Charles, founded the San 23 Francisco Chronicle newspaper in 1865.

24 Intervenor-defendant ExIn Corporation is a California
25 limited liability corporation formed by members of the Fang family, 26 including Florence Fang and her son Ted Fang, for the purpose of 27 acquiring certain assets associated with the Examiner. The Fang
28 family also owns Grant Publishing Company and Pan Asia Venture

1 Capital Corporation and publishes The Independent, a three-times-a-2 week free distribution newspaper, and other publications that 3 circulate in the San Francisco Bay area.

4
5 VIOLATIONS ALLEGED

6 Plaintiff alleges that an August 6, 1999, contract by 7 which Hearst agreed to acquire from CPC assets associated with the 8 Chronicle newspaper constitutes an unreasonable restraint of trade 9 in violation of section 1 of the Sherman Act, 15 USC § 1, an 10 unlawful attempt and conspiracy to monopolize in violation of 11 section 2 of the Sherman Act, 15 USC § 2, and calls for an 12 acquisition of assets that will substantially lessen competition or 13 tend to create a monopoly in trade and commerce in violation of 14 section 7 of the Clayton Act, 15 USC § 18.

15 In a proposed amended complaint, plaintiff also attacks
16 under the same provisions of the antitrust laws a March 16, 2000, 17 contract by which Hearst agreed to transfer certain assets
18 associated with the Examiner newspaper and make payments to ExIn.

19
20 JURISDICTION AND PROCEEDINGS

21 This court has jurisdiction of an action arising under 22 the federal antitrust laws pursuant to 28 USC §§ 1331 and 1337 and 23 sections 4 and 16 of the Clayton Act, 15 USC §§ 15, 26.

24 Plaintiff filed this action on January 11, 2000,
25 challenging the August 6 contract and seeking injunctive relief 26 under section 16 of the Clayton Act, 15 USC § 26. Because the 27 March 16 transaction post-dated the initial complaint, plaintiff 28 initially sought to enjoin only CPC's sale of the Chronicle to

1 provided with a fair presentation of the issues. The Supreme Court
2 has identified three constitutional standing requirements. A party
3 seeking to invoke federal jurisdiction must demonstrate: (1) injury 4 to a legally protected interest; (2) a causal relationship between 5 the injury and the challenged conduct and (3) a likelihood that the 6 injury will be redressed by a favorable decision. Northeastern 7 Florida Contractors v Jacksonville, 508 US 656, 663 (1993).

8 In an action seeking relief under the antitrust laws in 9 issue, plaintiff faces the additional requirement of showing that 10 the actual or threatened injury to plaintiff also constitutes an 11 injury to competition. See, for example, Cargill, Inc v Monfort of 12 Colorado, Inc, 479 US 104, 109-113 (1986).

13 Standing analysis in this case is informed, in part, by 14 the Newspaper Preservation Act (NPA), 15 USC §§ 1801-1804. The NPA 15 provides an antitrust exemption for an otherwise unlawful 16 combination or merger of two newspapers' business operations if the 17 market for newspaper circulation and advertising does not provide 18 sufficient revenue to support independent publication of the 19 newspapers. In that situation, the NPA permits two newspaper firms 20 to combine their business operations as long as they continue to 21 produce separate newspapers.

22 Although the NPA does not confer affirmative rights on 23 newspaper readers or advertisers or competing newspaper firms, the 24 Sherman Act and Clayton Act should be read bearing in mind the 25 legislative purposes that prompted enactment of the NPA; namely, 26 encouragement of multiple sources of newspaper news, features and 27 opinion. The NPA thus imports distinctly non-economic 28 considerations into the antitrust statutes, which otherwise

1 exclusively confine their scope to matters of economic consequence.
2 Under this statutory framework, the elimination of a newspaper 3 represents a cognizable injury to interests protected by the 4 antitrust laws, and this injury supplies a ground for standing 5 under Article III.

6 Plaintiff claims that the challenged transactions would 7 eliminate one of only two providers of daily newspaper news,
8 features and opinion in what plaintiff contends is the relevant
9 market. This position was more starkly apparent at the time
10 plaintiff filed his initial complaint, when Hearst's stated 11 intention was to cease production of the Examiner and no buyer had 12 come forward with plans to preserve a paper under that name. The 13 March 16 transaction purports to maintain the Examiner as an 14 independent source of newspaper news, features and opinion and thus 15 would appear facially consistent with the goals of the NPA and, 16 ironically enough, with plaintiff's purported objective in 17 maintaining this litigation. Plaintiff contends, however, that the 18 March 16 transaction is a sham, a fig leaf for conduct that 19 violates sections 1 and 2, and will merely postpone the ultimate 20 annihilation of an otherwise economically viable Examiner. These 21 claims, while novel, would appear to state a cognizable injury to 22 plaintiff as a consumer of newspaper news, features and opinion and 23 to competition in that market; if proved, such a claim would 24 entitle plaintiff to injunctive relief under section 16 of the 25 Clayton Act, 15 USC § 26.

26 It follows from the analysis above that plaintiff's 27 standing is limited; as a consumer of newspaper news, features and 28 opinions, he is entitled to attempt to prove that the challenged

1 transactions cause injury to competition for readers among 2 economically viable newspapers. Based on the markets in which 3 newspapers compete, there are two other possible bases for standing 4 to challenge the transactions at bar: alleged injury to advertisers
5 or to competing publishers. Plaintiff does not claim standing as a 6 purchaser of advertising in the newspapers published by Hearst and 7 CPC; the effect of the transactions at bar on the market for 8 advertising is not, therefore, an issue that plaintiff has standing 9 to raise. Plaintiff's failed attempt to acquire the Examiner might 10 afford him standing as a potential publishing competitor, but, for 11 reasons to be discussed presently, plaintiff's claim in this regard 12 fails at the outset because of the anticompetitive nature of his 13 offer to acquire the Examiner. Because plaintiff's standing as a 14 potential competitor fails, he cannot challenge, among other 15 things, provisions of the joint operating agreement restricting the 16 sale of a JOA publication (such as the right of first refusal and 17 60-mile provisions).

18 19 ORIGINS OF HEARST-CPC PARTNERSHIP

20 In 1959, four general paid circulation newspapers were 21 published in San Francisco by three competing firms: CPC's 22 Chronicle was a daily morning and Sunday newspaper; Hearst 23 published a daily morning and Sunday newspaper, the Examiner, as 24 well a six-day afternoon newspaper, the Call-Bulletin; Scripps-25 Howard published a six-day afternoon newspaper, the News. In 1959, 26 Hearst bought the News and re-titled its afternoon offering the 27 News-Call-Bulletin.

28

1 Between 1959 and 1964, Hearst and CPC competed vigorously 2 for circulation and advertising. Both firms suffered losses on 3 their San Francisco newspapers. Hearst underwrote these losses
4 from its other operations; CPC survived largely through the profits
5 of KRON-TV. By 1964, the Chronicle enjoyed an advantage in daily 6 circulation while the Examiner had a greater Sunday circulation.

7 On October 23, 1964, Hearst and CPC entered into a joint 8 operating agreement (JOA) which became effective in 1965. That 9 agreement formed the San Francisco Newspaper Agency (SFNA), a 10 corporation owned in equal shares by Hearst and CPC to which the 11 companies delegated responsibility for printing, distribution and 12 advertising sales of both papers and transferred assets associated 13 with those functions. SFNA immediately undertook a reorganization
14 of the companies' newspaper offerings. First, SFNA ceased
15 publication of the News-Call-Bulletin and shifted the morning
16 Examiner to the afternoon. Second, SFNA began producing a combined 17 Sunday newspaper, with the news portion published under the 18 Examiner masthead and employing Examiner features, while a datebook 19 and book review section and an opinion and commentary section were 20 published under the Chronicle masthead. The non-Sunday Chronicle
21 and Examiner remained separate editorial products with all business 22 operations under the direction of SFNA.

23 Under the terms of the joint operating agreement, which 24 persist to the present, SFNA bears all costs of publication other 25 than those associated with creating editorial content and collects 26 all revenues generated by advertising sales and circulation. The 27 excess of revenue over expenses is then distributed equally between 28

1 Hearst and CPC, regardless of the costs and revenue attributable to 2 each newspaper in the joint operation.

3 The original term of the JOA was thirty years, with each
4 party entitled to one ten-year renewal for a maximum potential term
5 of fifty years. In 1995, Hearst exercised its renewal right, 6 extending the JOA until 2005. In 1997, CPC gave notice that it
7 would not extend the JOA beyond 2005, thereby ensuring its 8 termination in that year at the latest.

9 In entering the JOA, Hearst and CPC followed the lead of 10 other newspaper publishers in the United States who, beginning in 11 the years of the Great Depression, negotiated similar agreements 12 designed to achieve economies in the business operations of 13 previously competing newspapers while maintaining separate 14 editorial operations. One of the earliest such agreements was 15 negotiated in Tucson, AZ, between the publishers of the Tucson 16 Daily Citizen and the Arizona Daily Star.

17 In 1969, the United States Supreme Court affirmed a 18 district court decision holding that: (1) the Tucson joint 19 operating arrangement constituted a price fixing, profit pooling 20 and market allocation agreement illegal per se under section 1 of 21 the Sherman Act; (2) the agreement gave the newspapers monopoly 22 power and was in furtherance of a conspiracy to monopolize in 23 violation of section 2 of the Sherman Act; and (3) the acquisition 24 of one of the parties in 1965 pursuant to the terms of the joint 25 agreement was in violation of section 7 of the Celler-Kefauver Act 26 amendments to the Clayton Act. Citizen Publishing Co v United 27 States, 394 US 131 (1969). This rendered the Hearst/CPC joint 28

1 particular, its equal profit split diminishes the economic 2 incentives of the parties to devote the necessary resources to 3 optimize readers' acceptance of the two newspapers; for each dollar
4 spent on improving its newspaper, the JOA party reaps only fifty 5 cents of any resulting profit. The result, in the words of 6 defendants' expert, is that San Francisco has been 7 "undernewspapered for some time."

8 The profit-sharing agreement has also contributed to 9 profound tension within the JOA. The JOA contemplates partners of 10 relatively equal strength, as the newspapers of Hearst and CPC were 11 at the JOA's inception. For a number of reasons, this equilibrium 12 has disappeared rather dramatically, as reflected by the steady 13 growth of daily circulation of the Chronicle relative to the 14 Examiner since inception of the JOA. In 1964, the Chronicle's
15 daily circulation was 351,489, as opposed to the Examiner's daily 16 circulation of 301,356. By 1998, daily circulation of the 17 Chronicle was 482,268, while the Examiner's daily circulation had 18 diminished to 114,774. Since 1998, the circulation of the Examiner 19 relative to the Chronicle has fallen further. At the time of 20 trial, the Chronicle's daily circulation exceeds that of the 21 Examiner by better than 4:1.

22 An important factor accounting for the Chronicle's
23 relative growth is that paper's position in the morning publication
24 cycle. Due to heavier daytime road traffic, a morning newspaper 25 distributed at night or in the early morning hours enjoys greater 26 flexibility and ease in making home deliveries in a large urban 27 region such as the San Francisco Bay area. Morning newspapers are 28 also better geared to lifestyle, work and commuting patterns

1 By October 1997, Sias had informed Bennack that CPC would 2 not exercise its right to extend the JOA and that the JOA would, 3 therefore, expire in 2005. The JOA provides that at the end of the 4 term of the agreement, Hearst and CPC will cooperate in dissolving 5 SFNA to enable both companies to engage in publishing their 6 respective newspapers separately.

7 But Sias and Bennack regarded the prospect of separate 8 publication and head-to-head competition after termination of the 9 JOA as hopelessly unrealistic. The economics of the newspaper 10 industry have made it virtually impossible for more than one 11 general circulation daily newspaper to survive in competition in 12 the same city. When one newspaper rises to a certain dominance in 13 a geographic area, advertisers are able to reach their intended 14 audiences with placements in one newspaper rather than two or more;
15 to cut advertising costs, advertisers have tended to eliminate 16 advertising in the smaller general circulation papers. Since lower 17 circulation rates lead to fewer advertisements, and fewer 18 advertisements make a newspaper less attractive to readers who 19 value the information advertisements provide, declines in 20 advertising and circulation tend to aggravate one another. This 21 process gathers momentum and the decline in a weaker newspaper's 22 business becomes self-fulfilling, leading almost inevitably to its 23 demise.

24 These economic forces have played out in city after city
25 across the United States, eliminating newspapers that directly 26 compete in the same geographic area in all but a handful of the 27 largest metropolitan newspaper markets in the country. At trial, 28 only five such major cities were identified (Boston, Chicago,

1 Denver, New York and Washington) and, during trial, the publishers
2 in one of those cities (Denver) announced their intention to enter 3 a joint operating arrangement. It is widely believed in the 4 newspaper industry that in at least two, if not all, of the four 5 cities in which there are directly competing general circulation 6 metropolitan daily newspapers covering the same geographic area, 7 the smaller newspapers operate at substantial deficits.

8 For these reasons, both Sias and Bennack believed that 9 only one of the two San Francisco newspapers produced by SFNA could 10 survive termination of the JOA. Although Sias and Bennack
11 threatened each other with the prospect of head-to-head competition 12 at the end of the JOA, such threats were simply posturing in 13 business negotiations, not genuine expressions of intent.

14 Bennack set ownership of the surviving newspaper as a 15 long-term goal for Hearst. Several factors left Hearst well-16 positioned to achieve this goal. First, it seemed likely that CPC 17 would sell. CPC shareholders had in recent years been riven by 18 discord and animosity, much of it centered on the direction of CPC.
19 Many CPC shareholders have much of their wealth tied up in illiquid 20 CPC stock and depend on distributions from CPC to maintain their 21 living standards. Bennack was aware of these circumstances and 22 their potential effect on the ability and willingness of CPC to 23 remain in the business of publishing the Chronicle.

24 Second, the JOA gave Hearst a strong position vis-a-vis
25 other potential bidders. Hearst already owned half of all assets
26 of SFNA. Furthermore, certain provisions of the JOA gave Hearst 27 rights against outside buyers, including a right of first refusal 28 and the right to prevent a sale of the Chronicle to a publisher of 1 a newspaper within sixty miles of San Francisco. Although the 2 legality of these provisions is suspect, they constituted another 3 bargaining chip for Hearst.

4 Finally, Hearst faced no financial exigencies. Its 5 financial strength relative to CPC gave it leeway and bargaining
6 power and, unlike CPC, it viewed its position within the JOA as a 7 sound investment, thanks largely to the free riding Hearst enjoyed 8 via the equal profit split.

9 Nevertheless, the expiration of the JOA in 2005 imposed a 10 limit on Hearst's ability to hold out; at expiration of the JOA, 11 the Examiner, with its circulation a mere fraction of that of the 12 Chronicle, was a sure loser as a separate newspaper. Bennack had 13 leverage to achieve Hearst's goal of owning the surviving San 14 Francisco newspaper, but it would gradually diminish as 2005 15 approached. As the twentieth century drew to a close, the time for 16 Hearst to move drew nigh.

17 In January 1999, Hearst transferred Timothy O White from 18 its Albany, NY, newspaper to San Francisco to become publisher of 19 the Examiner. In addition to running the Examiner, White's 20 assignment was to take charge of shepherding Hearst through 21 termination of the JOA and a takeover of the Chronicle.

22 In February 1999, CPC hired Donaldson Lufkin & Jenrette
23 (DLJ), an investment banking firm, to advise CPC shareholders 24 concerning their investments in CPC. DLJ's analysis covered all of 25 CPC's assets. In May 1999, DLJ recommended sale of all assets of 26 the company, including the Chronicle. CPC's shareholders accepted 27 DLJ's recommendation and engaged DLJ to find buyers for these 28 assets. DLJ's Jill Greenthal took charge of the project. Before

1 CPC contacted other prospective buyers, Hearst submitted a bid of 2 $565 million for the Chronicle. DLJ rejected this bid and 3 proceeded to circulate offering documents to prospective purchasers
4 of CPC assets.

5 Three major publishing firms, each with adequate
6 financial resources to be considered serious bidders, expressed
7 interest in buying CPC's Chronicle assets. Knight-Ridder, 8 publisher of the San Jose Mercury-News, Contra Costa Times and 9 other newspapers, showed interest at the low to mid $400 million
10 levels; Gannett, publisher of USA Today, the Marin Independent-
11 Journal and other newspapers appeared willing to pay in the range
12 of high $400 million to low $500 million; Times-Mirror, publisher 13 of the Los Angeles Times and other newspapers, expressed an 14 interest in about the same range and a willingness also to buy 15 CPC's Bloomington and Worcester newspapers.

16 In June 1999, Hearst retained Wasserstein Parella & Co
17 (WP), an investment banking firm, to negotiate on its behalf. WP 18 apprised Bennack of the progress of its negotiations with DLJ.
19 Consistent with Bennack's strategy of a quick and decisive move, 20 Hearst submitted a bid of at least $150 million greater than any 21 competing offer. As a result of negotiations conducted by DLJ and 22 WP, the parties struck a deal whereby Hearst would acquire the 23 Chronicle and CPC's interest in SFNA for a total of $660 million.
24 Greenthal considered this a preemptive bid and recommended its 25 approval and acceptance. CPC gave that approval and the parties 26 formally entered into an agreement for sale of the Chronicle and 27 CPC's interest in the JOA.

28

1 relatively short reach and provided no effective competition for 2 VHF stations. Radio was primarily on the AM band. FM stations
3 were few in number and provided mostly programming of limited 4 appeal (for example, classical music). Cable television was 5 largely confined to rural areas, imported distant signals only 6 rather than originating programming and carried little advertising.
7 The Internet was science fiction in 1965.

8 In 1999, there were thirty-two AM stations, forty-three 9 FM stations and twenty-eight television stations broadcasting in 10 the San Francisco Bay area. Cable television imports a multitude 11 of distant signals and provides a plethora of specialized cable 12 programming and advertising.

13 The Internet has opened a staggering array of news 14 sources. With relative ease, a person can select from a host of 15 suppliers of newspaper-like news, features and opinions. Most 16 major newspapers have web sites making it possible to access a 17 substantial part of their content on line. An Internet user can 18 design a unique individually tailored on-line newspaper by roaming 19 all news content servers and selecting stories and subjects of 20 interest. These new media provide new outlets for advertisers as 21 well. "Banner" advertisements have become commonplace on news and 22 shopping web sites.

23 Free-distribution newspapers and direct-mail advertising
24 vehicles provide attractive alternatives to traditional newspaper
25 advertising and have become numerous, leading to sidewalk clutter
26 of such magnitude that it itself has become a political hot potato
27 in San Francisco and elsewhere. In addition, there are many weekly 28 newspapers that circulate in San Francisco and the surrounding

1 counties and several alternative news weeklies (for example The Bay 2 Guardian, San Francisco Business Times), ethnic publications (for 3 example, Sun Reporter, Nishibei Times) and special interest
4 publications (for example, Bay Area Reporter). The Fangs'
5 Independent also competes with SFNA's newspapers for both readers 6 and advertising.

7 Perhaps most significantly, with the growth in population
8 and striking economic vitality of Santa Clara county, the San Jose 9 Mercury-News poses a serious challenge to the market share of the 10 San Francisco-based metropolitan dailies. The Mercury-News is a 11 comprehensive widely circulated newspaper of high quality. Its 12 inroads in the core circulation areas of the Chronicle and Examiner
13 along the San Francisco peninsula and in southern Alameda county 14 have been significant. From its base in Santa Clara county, the 15 Mercury-News rivals the Examiner's share of field in Alameda and 16 San Mateo counties and substantially exceeds the shares of field of 17 the Chronicle and Examiner in Santa Clara county. The Mercury-News
18 has recently stepped up its efforts to compete in San Francisco.
19 See Steve Rubenstein, Mercury News' New Edition Hits Stands in 20 'Frisco', San Francisco Chronicle A18 (July 26, 2000).

21 The robust competition between the San Francisco dailies
22 and the Mercury-News provides the best example of the market shift 23 that has occurred since the inception of the JOA. In 1965, the 24 geographic center of business activity in the San Francisco Bay
25 area was San Francisco, and newspapers in outlying counties posed 26 no significant threat to Hearst/CPC dominance. Since that year, 27 population and economic growth outside San Francisco has been 28

1 prodigious relative to that of San Francisco, upending the San 2 Francisco-centric market paradigm.

3 While a merger of the two dominant San Francisco dailies
4 in 1965 might well have posed an unquestionable threat of undue
5 concentration of market power under the old paradigm, that threat 6 today is far from clear. All of above-mentioned participants in 7 the market for information and advertising have the actual and 8 potential ability to deprive SFNA's newspapers of significant 9 levels of business. The economic picture in the media industry is 10 one of overlapping areas of competition, wherein each participant 11 competes for consumers and advertisers but also possesses a 12 discrete content or geography related "monopoly" over a subgroup of 13 consumers and advertisers who, for a variety of reasons, insist on 14 a particular media source. Media products, of course, are not 15 fungible goods. Branding, technological preferences and consumer 16 loyalty are important factors contributing to the quantum of market
17 power that individual media sources possess. In sum, the high 18 level of differentiation within the industry and the strong overlap 19 in product and geographic markets described above results in a form 20 of monopolistic competition. This economic dynamic has been 21 recognized in the economic literature as characteristic of modern 22 markets for non-fungible goods. See generally Edward H
23 Chamberlain, The Theory of Monopolistic Competition (Harvard Univ 24 Press 1933).

25 An industry exhibiting the characteristics of 26 monopolistic competition, because of its mix of monopoly and 27 competitive elements, does not lend itself well to traditional 28 antitrust analysis, with its considerations of concentration of

1 power in well-defined product and geographic markets. This, more 2 than anything else, explains the focus of the parties and 3 newspaper-merger precedent on the failing company defense. The 4 court concludes that the most productive approach is one, as 5 explained below, that assumes a threshold showing of concentration 6 in the relevant market and examines the competitive effects of the 7 merger in terms of the efficient allocation of resources.

8 In passing the NPA in 1970, the 91st Congress accepted 9 the notion that "ruinous competition" works more harm than good in 10 the newspaper business. Antitrust adjudicators had rejected that 11 argument in finding a newspaper joint operating agreement illegal 12 in Citizen Publishing Co v United States, 394 US 131 (1969). The 13 newspaper industry fared better with legislators, who determined 14 that the public interest in preserving editorial voices would be 15 best served by permitting newspaper monopolies conditioned on 16 maintenance of separate editorial functions.

17 Under Citizen Publishing, joint operating agreements such 18 as the Hearst/CPC arrangement involving price fixing and profit 19 pooling were illegal unless the participants could make out a 20 "failing company" defense. This required a weighty showing that 21 one of the businesses "is on the brink of collapse, its prospects 22 for reorganization are dim or nonexistent, and no other 23 noncompeting buyers are available." Committee for an Independent 24 P-I v Hearst Corp., 704 F2d 467, 474 (9th Cir 1983) (characterizing 25 Citizen Publishing formulation of failing company doctrine).

26 The NPA's antitrust exemptions expand the failing company 27 defense in the newspaper context in order to (1) legalize existing 28 JOAs and (2) make it easier for newspapers to enter JOAs. With

1 respect to the goal of preserving existing JOAs, the NPA immunizes 2 any JOA entered into prior to July 24, 1970, if at the time of its 3 inception "not more than one of the newspaper publications involved 4 in the performance of such arrangement was likely to remain or 5 become a financially sound publication." 15 USC § 1803(a).

6 The original bill provided this expansive protection
7 across the board, but legislative compromise resulted in a slimmer
8 exemption for future JOA participants. Thus, the NPA requires a 9 more stringent failing company showing for post-Act JOAs (in 10 addition to requiring Justice department preclearance). As a 11 prerequisite to approval, the Attorney General must determine that 12 no more than one of the participants is not "in probable danger of 13 financial failure." 15 USC §§ 1803(b), 1802(5). The more 14 favorable treatment for pre-Act JOAs appears to reflect the 15 legislative view that fairness issues counseled especially in favor 16 of protecting established JOAs (there were 22 at the time of 17 enactment). The prime concern was that such JOAs had received 18 tacit approval through decades of government inaction. See, for 19 example, Newspaper Preservation Act, Hearings on HR 279 before the 20 Antitrust Subcommittee of the House Committee on the Judiciary, 21 91st Cong, 1st Sess 481-82 (comments of Chairman Celler) ("The 22 indifference [of the government to JOAs] has lasted over a period 23 of four decades. That lends encouragement to the proliferation of 24 these joint agreements.").

25 As the foregoing illustrates, in enacting the NPA,
26 Congress sought to identify the circumstances under which newspaper 27 companies could enter a JOA. The instant case, of course, involves 28 an attempt by JOA partners to unwind their arrangement. The NPA

1 does not address antitrust issues arising from termination of a
2 JOA. Ironically, however, since enactment of the NPA, there have 3 been twice as many cases in which JOAs have terminated or the 4 parties have ceased publication of more than one product (fifteen, 5 although JOA termination occurred twice in Chattanooga) than cases 6 in which competitors have entered into a JOA (seven, including the 7 recently announced Denver agreement).

8 In the following cities, JOA partners have terminated
9 their agreement and/or ceased publication of one of two JOA
10 newspapers: Chattanooga, TN (first JOA) (1966); Anchorage, AK
11 (1979); St Louis, MO (1983); Franklin-Oil City, PA (1985);
12 Columbus, OH (1985); Miami, FL (1988); Shreveport, LA (1991);
13 Knoxville, TN (1991); Tulsa, OK (1992); Pittsburgh, PA (1992); El 14 Paso, TX (1997); Nashville, TN (1998); Evansville, IN (1998); 15 Chattanooga, TN (second JOA) (1999) and Honolulu, HI (1999).

16 These cases resulted in very little antitrust enforcement 17 activity or litigation, and did not produce a single published
18 judicial opinion. DOJ did, however, in two cases provide its view 19 of the relevant legal analysis governing an attempt by JOA partners 20 to merge or cease publication of multiple products.

21 In November 1983, Assistant Attorney General William F
22 Baxter, then head of the DOJ's antitrust division, issued a press
23 release concerning the proposed merger of JOA publications in St
24 Louis. The Pulitzer Publishing Company and Newhouse newspaper 25 group had since 1961 maintained a joint operating agreement
26 providing for profit pooling, joint production and joint printing 27 of their respective dailies, the St Louis Post-Dispatch and the 28 Globe-Democrat. The publishers had informed DOJ of their intent to

1 discontinue publication of the Globe-Democrat and to continue 2 jointly to publish the Post-Dispatch. Baxter explained that such 3 an arrangement would "end their existing exemption [under the NPA] 4 from the antitrust laws" and proceeded to define the legal standard 5 DOJ would apply to the transaction.

6 Although the Newspaper Preservation Act contains no 7 provision addressed to the discontinuance of the existing 8 joint operating arrangement, Baxter said the Act should 9 not be read as requiring publishers who once obtain an exemption to continue their separate publications forever without regard to the magnitude of the financial losses involved.

10 Baxter noted, however, that the NPA "could be abused if publishers 11 were free first to eliminate commercial competition by entering a 12 joint operating agreement in compliance with the Act and then to 13 discontinue editorial competition by abandoning one of the two 14 newspapers." This problem could be countered by application of the 15 Citizen Publishing test to proposed newspaper mergers, Baxter said.
16 "The Antitrust Division will * * * insist upon a rigorous 17 application of the more demanding, traditional failing firm test
18 whenever the parties to an existing joint operating agreement
19 propose to discontinue one of the two newspapers." The press 20 release described that test as requiring a showing "that the 21 resources of the acquired firm are so depleted and its prospects 22 for rehabilitation are so remote that it faces the probability of 23 business failure and that there are no prospective purchasers."

24 Subsequent to the DOJ press release, Newhouse sold assets
25 relating to the Globe-Democrat. The paper folded within two years.

26 In a case even more directly analogous to the case at 27 bar, DOJ made clear in a 1985 business review letter to JOA 28 publishers in Franklin-Oil City, PA, that the analysis set forth in

1 the Baxter press release applied to the proposed acquisition of one
2 JOA partner by another. The Franklin News Herald and the Oil City
3 Derrick had been published since 1959 under a joint operating 4 agreement between News-Herald Printing Company and Derrick 5 Publishing Company. The publishers informed DOJ of the proposed 6 acquisition of News-Herald by Derrick and concurrent termination of 7 the JOA. In response, acting Assistant Attorney General Charles F
8 Rule (applying the Baxter analysis) conducted an investigation of 9 the viability of the Derrick outside the JOA and assessed Derrick's 10 sales efforts and concluded that it would not take enforcement 11 action.

12 The DOJ statements from AAGs Baxter and Rule provide the 13 proper framework for analysis in the present case. They represent, 14 in effect, the unremarkable position that a transaction terminating 15 a JOA is subject to ordinary antitrust scrutiny. The very nature 16 of such a transaction makes clear that the parties are not seeking 17 to avail themselves of the NPA's antitrust exemptions. Although 18 inartful drafting of the NPA leaves open the argument that 19 termination of a JOA is exempt from antitrust scrutiny as an 20 amendment to the agreement, the defendants here, quite sensibly, 21 have not advanced this argument.

22 The court concludes that in an antitrust challenge to a 23 proposed merger of JOA newspapers, the defendants may avoid 24 liability by proving the traditional failing company defense of 25 Citizen Publishing. Broadly stated, this requires a showing that:
26 (1) one of the newspapers would be a failing company if operated 27 outside the JOA; and (2) there are no alternative purchasers
28 willing to operate the newspaper outside the JOA.

1 According to the standard enunciated in Citizen
2 Publishing, a failing company is one whose "resources are so
3 depleted and the prospects of rehabilitation so remote that it
4 faces grave probability of business failure." 394 US at 137
5 (internal citation omitted). In the context of a joint operating 6 agreement, where costs are revenues are intermingled between two 7 products performing at different levels, this question is not 8 simple. It involves speculation about future costs and revenues 9 arising from operation under changed circumstances and 10 consideration of the peculiar economics of the newspaper business 11 described above.

12 Defendants presented two forms of evidence regarding the 13 economic viability of the Examiner. First, defendants offered a 14 pro forma financial analysis using cost and revenue data for SFNA
15 from 1998 and attributing to the Examiner a share of SFNA revenue 16 equivalent to its share of total circulation (20 percent). Under 17 these projections (which incorporate financial assumptions 18 favorable to the Examiner), a stand-alone Examiner in 1998 would 19 have earned $91,828,859 in revenue and incurred $124,988,018 in 20 costs, for a net loss of $33,159,160.

21 These figures make a compelling case that the Examiner is 22 a failing company. To be sure, many firms remain in business even 23 when they sustain losses, but when the cost of securing a dollar of 24 marginal revenue exceeds that dollar, the rational course is to 25 reduce output to a level consistent with revenue prospects. Only 26 if there is a prospect of recovering present losses through future 27 profits can a rational firm continue to incur the loss.

28

1 In this case, the evidence establishes that the Examiner,
2 operating as a general circulation metropolitan daily and Sunday 3 newspaper outside the JOA and independent of the Chronicle, would 4 have to overcome a 4:1 circulation disadvantage to achieve not only 5 future profitability, but profitability sufficient to recoup any 6 losses that Hearst would incur during the period of losses. A 7 circulation disadvantage of this magnitude is considerably greater 8 than that which Hearst or any commercially motivated publisher
9 could surmount to achieve profitability.

10 Such evidence was not contested by plaintiff to any 11 significant degree. Plaintiff's expert witnesses testified about 12 redirecting the Examiner editorial product or circulation pattern 13 in various ways to secure sound economic footing, but their 14 testimony was highly speculative and anecdotal, not backed by 15 serious market analysis, leaving the court unconvinced. Any 16 argument that plaintiff might advance regarding the viability of a 17 stand-alone Examiner is completely undercut by his insistence in 18 his negotiations with Hearst for a large subsidy to take the 19 Examiner off Hearst's hands. Accordingly, the court finds that as 20 a stand-alone metropolitan daily, the Examiner's prospects of 21 survival are extremely remote.

22 The second form of evidence presented by defendants 23 approaches the question in a different way. Rather than attempting 24 to model the performance of a stand-alone Examiner based on some 25 percentage of current operating costs and revenues of SFNA, the 26 second approach assesses the value of the Examiner to the joint 27 enterprise as a whole. If continued publication of the Examiner 28 does not make a net contribution to the joint profits of the

1 enterprise, the argument runs, principles of allocative efficiency
2 dictate that the Examiner should be closed. Under this analysis, a 3 failing JOA newspaper is one whose incremental costs exceed the 4 incremental revenues attributable to its operation within the JOA.

5 This test is consistent with that articulated in Citizen
6 Publishing, since "a grave probability of business failure" for a 7 particular product within a larger enterprise exists when the 8 incremental costs of continuing that product exceed the incremental
9 revenues it generates for the operation. Indeed, in another
10 currently pending case involving JOA termination, DOJ has indicated 11 that analysis of incremental costs and revenues is an appropriate 12 test of the viability of an allegedly failing JOA newspaper. See 13 Brief Amicus Curie of the United States at 23, n15, filed in Hawaii 14 v Gannett Pacific Corp, No 99-17201 (9th Cir) ("[A] decision to 15 terminate a newspaper whose incremental costs exceed the 16 incremental revenues attributable to its operation is unlikely to 17 violate the antitrust laws.").

18 The most reliable evidence at trial on this question came 19 from defendants' expert, James N Rosse, who calculated the change
20 in JOA profits that would result from closing the Examiner, using a 21 conservative estimate of retained circulation of 40,000. From 1999
22 financial data, the following picture emerged: circulation declines 23 would result in a $26,392,069 decrease in total revenue, while 24 savings in printing, production, circulation resulted in a decrease
25 of $30,792,573 in SFNA expenses and elimination of Examiner
26 editorial costs resulted in a decrease of $17,320,263 in non-agency 27 expenses. The net effect on profit to the enterprise was a gain of 28 $21,720,767 from closure of the Examiner. This evidence

1 establishes that the Examiner imposes a substantial drain on the 2 profitability of the JOA enterprise as a whole.

3 From defendants' showing the court concludes that the 4 first prong of the Citizen Publishing failing company test has been 5 met. Defendant's financial estimates, while obviously containing 6 some speculation, employ conservative assumptions and present a
7 realistic reflection of the Examiner's economic prospects. Rosse's 8 testimony was essentially un rebutted. These projections establish 9 that the Examiner is not economically viable either as a stand-10 alone product or part of the joint enterprise.

11 Citizen Publishing also establishes a "no alternative 12 purchaser" prong of the failing company defense. This prong 13 supplements analysis of financial data by testing the viability of 14 the alleged failing newspaper in the market. If an alternative 15 purchaser can be found for the allegedly failing JOA product (1) 16 the product is presumably economically viable and (2) the sale will 17 be preferable to its closure because a competitor will be preserved 18 rather than eliminated.

19 In July 1999 and January 2000, Hearst conducted two major
20 sales efforts of Examiner assets through its broker, Veronis Suhler
21 & Associates, a media investment banking firm. The July 1999 offer 22 included the Examiner name, editorial equipment, racks, archives, 23 the opportunity to employ editorial staff and a transitional
24 agreement for production and distribution. The January 2000 offer 25 added printing and distribution assets sufficient to enable a buyer 26 to commence publication of the Examiner on a "turnkey" basis.
27 Veronis Suhler announced the offers publicly and contacted directly 28 91 prospective purchasers (newspaper publishers, media groups and

1 following reasons. First, legality of the August 6 transaction is 2 a threshold issue: if Hearst may lawfully acquire Chronicle and 3 close the Examiner (as the court has concluded it may), the Fang 4 transaction is obviously not dictated by antitrust law. Second, as 5 the discussion of the facts leading to its consummation reveals, 6 the Fang transaction was not contemplated by Hearst and CPC and 7 does not constitute a part of their original deal. It follows that 8 the particular circumstances and antitrust ramifications of the 9 Fang transaction merit independent scrutiny.

10 With an agreement for the purchase and sale of the 11 Chronicle reached, the parties faced two serious and related 12 obstacles to completing the transaction. An acquisition of the 13 size proposed would require regulatory clearance pursuant to 15 USC 14 § 18a. And due to the symbiotic relationship between local 15 newspapers and local politics, the parties anticipated their deal 16 would face significant political scrutiny and, perhaps, significant 17 opposition. Such concerns were well founded in the parties' prior 18 experience. In May 1996, when premature published reports had 19 appeared about Hearst's possible acquisition of the Chronicle,
20 Willie L Brown Jr, mayor of San Francisco, wrote to Attorney
21 General Janet Reno expressing concern about the rumored 22 transaction.

23 Hearst believed that an effort to sell the Examiner would 24 aid it in gaining regulatory and public approval of the Chronicle
25 acquisition. On July 30, 1999, Hearst retained Veronis Suhler &
26 Associates to represent Hearst in seeking a buyer for the Examiner 27 as a stand-alone newspaper. Veronis Suhler conducted an initial 28

1 offering of a package of Examiner assets, including the masthead 2 and some publishing equipment.

3 On July 28, 1999, while DLJ and WP were working out the 4 details of what became the August 6 agreement, White met with Mayor 5 Brown to discuss Hearst's possible acquisition of the Chronicle.
6 After this meeting, White reported to his superiors at Hearst that 7 he had pitched Brown extensively for his support. According to 8 White's report to his superiors, Mayor Brown said that if Hearst 9 wished to avoid problems with city government Hearst should settle 10 outstanding litigation with the Fang group over allegations of 11 predatory pricing. Such litigation could have "funny undesired 12 consequences * * * even if one thing has nothing to do with the 13 other."

14 The Fangs are important political allies of the mayor and 15 have supported his endeavors in the pages of the Independent and 16 through other campaign efforts. On July 29, 1999, White advised
17 Mayor Brown that Hearst would be pleased to meet with Florence Fang 18 at any time and any place.

19 On August 6, 1999, the day Hearst announced the proposed 20 Chronicle acquisition, Bennack and other senior Hearst officials, 21 including White, met with Mayor Brown in San Francisco. Also on 22 that day, Hearst informally notified the United States Department 23 of Justice, Antitrust Division (DOJ), of the transaction.

24 On August 20, 1999, Mayor Brown wrote Attorney General 25 Reno that early termination of the JOA would result in closing the 26 Examiner and threaten San Francisco's third newspaper. Hearst 27 interpreted the reference to the third newspaper to mean Fang's 28 Independent. Copies of this letter were sent to other

1 Congressional representatives from the San Francisco Bay area, 2 including Senator Dianne Feinstein, a former mayor of San 3 Francisco, long-time member of the city's board of supervisors and 4 a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, which oversees DOJ.

5 On August 30, 1999, White and Examiner editor Phil
6 Bronstein met with Mayor Brown. At the time, Mayor Brown was a
7 candidate for re-election. On the day of this meeting, White e-8 mailed George Irish, president of Hearst's newspaper division, that 9 he had asked Brown how White could justify to his superiors in New 10 York wanting to support Brown when the mayor seemed to go out of 11 his way to make life difficult for Hearst. According to White, 12 Brown replied that he was doing no more than was politically 13 minimally necessary to placate the board of supervisors and other 14 constituents, and that Attorney General Reno had told him there 15 would be no hearings on Hearst's acquisition of the Chronicle.
16 White's e-mail was forwarded the next day to Bennack, Hearst's 17 chief legal officer James Asher and Hearst's counsel.

18 In a telephone conversation following the August 30 19 meeting, White told Irish that at the meeting Mayor Brown brought 20 up the subject of the Examiner's critical coverage of San 21 Francisco's minority contracting program, a project strongly
22 supported by the mayor. White reported that he made clear to Mayor 23 Brown that the newspaper's editorial treatment of Brown would ease
24 off if he supported Hearst's acquisition of the Chronicle. White 25 offered to "horse trade" favorable editorial coverage of the mayor
26 in return for Brown's support. White reported that Mayor Brown 27 said that he and other city officials would not be a problem for 28 Hearst. According to White, the mayor mentioned that the city

1 attorney's investigation into the Chronicle purchase had been 2 assigned to a "lightweight," someone not likely to lead a charge on 3 a major issue.

4 Irish and Bennack were aware of White's overtures to 5 "horse trade" favorable editorial coverage in exchange for Brown's 6 support of Hearst's Chronicle acquisition at the time, or shortly
7 after, White made them. In their testimony, Irish and Bennack
8 denied knowing of White's overtures to Brown until White testified 9 about them in trial on May 1, 2000. These denials are not credible
10 and the court does not believe them for the following reasons: (1) 11 Irish and Bennack received e-mails from White describing his 12 conversations with Brown; (2) Hearst's acquisition of the Chronicle 13 was an important business objective of Bennack and Irish and it is 14 probable that they would have paid close attention to White's 15 reports of his efforts to enlist local politicians to support 16 Hearst's acquisition; (3) the demeanor of Bennack and Irish on the 17 witness stand suggests that their testimony in this regard was not 18 forthright--this is particularly true of Irish who simply was not a 19 believable witness in this aspect of his testimony--and (4) White's 20 rather forthright testimony and demeanor on the witness stand with 21 respect to his overtures to trade editorial coverage for Brown's 22 support suggest that White did not expect such testimony would come 23 as a surprise to his superiors or that his superiors would not 24 corroborate his statements.

25 On October 19, 1999, White reported to Irish that Mayor 26 Brown's campaign consultant and "consiglieri to the Fangs" was 27 speculating on litigation to tie up Hearst's acquisition of the 28 Chronicle for years.

1 Hearst officials were of the view that, irrespective of 2 the strength of Hearst's legal position, the mayor and other local 3 political figures could at the very least significantly delay the 4 Chronicle acquisition and perhaps derail the deal altogether.
5 These concerns were based not only on the ability of local 6 politicians to shape public opinion and to initiate legal 7 proceedings but also on the perceived influence of such officials, 8 Brown and Feinstein in particular, over the direction of the DOJ 9 investigation. Hearst decided that efforts to curry favor with the 10 mayor should be a top priority. The offer to "horse trade" 11 favorable coverage was the start, but not the end, of such efforts.

12 In its initial correspondence to DOJ, on September 23,
13 1999, Hearst presented an exhaustive survey of the circumstances
14 surrounding previous JOA terminations in 14 cities and the position 15 (if any) of DOJ in those cases. Hearst concluded that the 16 Chronicle acquisition raised no antitrust concerns and urged DOJ to 17 grant a request for early termination of the waiting period
18 prescribed by pre-merger approval rules.

19 In dealing with DOJ, Hearst was handicapped by a lack of 20 binding precedent and a loose statutory framework that vests in DOJ 21 broad authority without setting enforcement standards. Hearst was 22 forced to derive its legal arguments from informal agency documents
23 and press releases. DOJ expanded and continued its investigation 24 without providing any legal basis for its concerns.

25 On October 15, 1999, DOJ made a second request to Hearst
26 for information about acquisition of the Chronicle. This request 27 was extremely burdensome and entailed time-consuming responses, and 28 appears to have called for a great deal of information irrelevant

1 to Hearst's effort to acquire the Chronicle or to any economic or 2 antitrust issues that this acquisition might raise. The request
3 was a significant setback for Hearst and reinforced Hearst's belief
4 that, no matter how persuasive its legal arguments, the Chronicle 5 transaction was subject to deal-threatening delay at the whim of 6 DOJ and local politicians.

7 On December 2, 1999, Hearst's Asher received a telephone
8 call from the Fangs' lawyer offering to take the Examiner off
9 Hearst's hands if Hearst would provide a cash subsidy of $35
10 million for five years and promised not to engage in distribution 11 of free newspapers. According to Asher, the attorney said the 12 Fangs would use their extensive political connections to assist in 13 completing Hearst's purchase of the Chronicle.

14 By late 1999, DOJ had communicated to Hearst that it
15 favored an aggressive effort to sell the Examiner as a going 16 concern with Hearst's full interest in the JOA as the best test for 17 whether the Examiner could be considered a failing company. DOJ
18 provided no legal justification for its position or its rejection 19 of Hearst's arguments that a sales effort was unnecessary.

20 Hearst instructed Veronis Suhler to make a second 21 offering of Examiner assets. The offer included all assets
22 previously offered plus Hearst's San Francisco printing plant.
23 Hearst did not offer its interest in the JOA.

24 Three parties expressed an interest in this enhanced 25 package of Examiner assets and in undertaking publication of a 26 newspaper: plaintiff, the Fang group and Leucadia, a New York
27 distressed finance company. Each party, however, requested either 28

1 participation in the JOA or some form of subsidy from Hearst.
2 Hearst received no offer at or above liquidation value.

3 At his inaugural address on January 8, 2000, Mayor Brown
4 expressed displeasure about a "quick marriage of our two daily
5 newspapers." Brown stated: "Let's let [Hearst] have the Chronicle, 6 maybe it will make it a better paper, who knows. But let them have 7 the Chronicle. But leave the Examiner as a civic treasure for us."
8 The mayor then urged formation of a group to buy the Examiner.

9 Hearst concluded that its efforts to persuade Mayor Brown
10 to drop his opposition to an Examiner shutdown, including the offer 11 to trade favorable editorial coverage, were failing. Hearst 12 decided that given Mayor Brown's earlier public expressions of 13 concern about Hearst's purchase of the Chronicle, a "sale" of the 14 Examiner was necessary to allow the mayor to save face and that 15 only a "sale" to a buyer favored by the mayor would engender his 16 support for Hearst's acquisition of the Chronicle.

17 Hearst also concluded that San Francisco political 18 figures were influencing the course of DOJ's investigation and that 19 Brown's support was crucial to obtaining DOJ clearance for the 20 Chronicle acquisition.

21 On January 21, 2000, White met with Florence Fang and 22 Senator Feinstein. White and Fang discussed the possibility of 23 Fang publishing a daily newspaper under the Examiner banner.

24 In a February 24, 2000, meeting with DOJ investigators, 25 Hearst again pressed its argument that the Examiner was a failing 26 company and that it therefore could be removed from the market 27 without injury to competition. Hearst cited the results of its 28 second offering of Examiner assets, which failed to produce a bid

1 at or above liquidation value. DOJ declined to accept Hearst's 2 arguments or characterization of the offers received.

3 On March 16, 2000, Hearst entered into a contract
4 involving a transfer of Examiner assets to ExIn. The contract
5 calls for Hearst to subsidize up to $66 million of the Examiner's
6 operating costs for a three-year period. Under this arrangement, 7 the Fang group will not have to invest its own capital to run the 8 Examiner, and the Fang group does not intend to put any of its own 9 money into covering losses incurred in publishing the Examiner.
10 Allowable expenses include an annual salary to Ted Fang of 11 $500,000.

12 Under ExIn management, the Examiner will be a paid, six-
13 day-a-week morning newspaper circulating primarily in San Francisco
14 and, to a limited extent, parts of San Mateo county. The Examiner 15 will be substantially reduced in the scope of its coverage and will 16 focus almost exclusively on local coverage of San Francisco. ExIn 17 anticipates a circulation of 50,000-75,000.

18 In the course of DOJ's investigation, Hearst took the 19 position that to be "fully competitive," a competing newspaper 20 would need to have approximately the same circulation as the 21 Chronicle, that is, about 475,000 daily and 590,000 Sunday. Hearst 22 represented in its Hart-Scott-Rodino submission to DOJ that a fully 23 competing metropolitan newspaper could not survive with less than 24 300,000 daily and 400,000 Sunday circulation. At least as early as 25 the public announcement of the March 16 transaction, Hearst knew 26 that ExIn did not intend to produce a "fully competitive" newspaper 27 as Hearst had used that term with DOJ.

28

1 participants to compete in that localized market. Furthermore,
2 Hearst undoubtedly will attempt to recover the subsidy it is 3 obligated to pay the Fang group through higher advertising rates in 4 the Chronicle. With these facts, a persuasive case might be made 5 that the March 16 transaction violates the antitrust laws.

6 But this conclusion cannot be predicated on the record of 7 the present proceedings, and the court is presently unable to do
8 more than identify the malodorous aspects of the Fang transaction.
9 That is because plaintiff does not have standing to challenge the 10 transaction on the grounds identified. An antitrust challenge to a 11 transaction propping up a competitor with a subsidy cannot be 12 brought by a plaintiff who demanded an even greater subsidy.
13 Reilly's insistence on a larger subsidy than the Fangs eliminates 14 the factual basis for Reilly's standing as a potential purchaser of 15 the Examiner. Reilly will not suffer injury in fact due to 16 lessened competition attributable to the March 16 agreement because 17 he is unwilling to enter into publication of a competing newspaper 18 on terms less onerous than those imposed by Hearst's obligations to 19 the Fangs under that agreement.

20 Hearst, which undisputedly has suffered injury as a 21 result of being compelled to enter the Fang transaction, is not 22 seeking relief from it. This, no doubt, reflects a tactical 23 decision to put this incident behind it rather than to call 24 attention to its own role in a checkered transaction.

25 Deeply troubling is the obvious tension between the 26 court's conclusions from the evidence and the position of DOJ,
27 implied in its March 30 press release and made explicit in post-28 trial submissions to the court, that its decision not to challenge

1 the Hearst/Chronicle deal was contingent upon the Fang transaction.
2 Insofar as the court has adopted analysis provided by the 3 department in earlier JOA termination cases, the court was 4 especially concerned to understand the legal basis for DOJ's 5 position. To this end, the court invited DOJ to intervene in this 6 case or file an amicus brief--an invitation the department 7 declined. Nor in its submissions did DOJ provide any legal 8 analysis in support of its antitrust "concerns" about the August 6 9 transaction, failing to so much as mention the standard applied in 10 earlier JOA termination cases.

11 To their great credit, AAGs Baxter and Rule afforded a 12 principled explanation for the DOJ position in St. Louis and Oil 13 City. In the press release and business review letter cited above, 14 DOJ set forward a legal framework for analysis of JOA terminations 15 and mergers of JOA publications, which the court has adopted in 16 this case. From DOJ's amicus brief in the pending case involving a 17 JOA in Hawaii, in which DOJ stated that "a decision to terminate a 18 newspaper whose incremental costs exceed the incremental revenues
19 attributable to its operation is unlikely to violate the antitrust 20 laws," DOJ expressed a legal opinion in keeping with the failing 21 company analysis provided by AAGs Baxter and Rule.

22 In this case, however, DOJ appears inexplicably to have 23 departed from the Baxter-Rule approach. In DOJ's initial post-
24 trial submission, the lead investigator of the Hearst deal stated 25 that DOJ viewed "an attempt to sell Hearst's full interest in the 26 JOA as an appropriate test of the Examiner's viability." As the 27 court has already explained, this test is inconsistent with the 28 idea that the "alternative purchaser" prong of Citizen Publishing

1 requires a JOA publisher to seek a buyer willing to operate the 2 newspaper outside the JOA.

3 Just as the court cannot discern the legal basis for 4 DOJ's opposition to Hearst's acquisition of the Chronicle, it is 5 unable to find any principled reason for DOJ's apparent faith in 6 the competitive merits of the Fang transaction. Here, DOJ's 7 failure to provide legal analysis is similarly glaring.

8 According to its March 30 press release, DOJ concluded
9 that the Fang transaction would bestow upon advertisers and readers 10 "the benefits of full competition" for the first time in 35 years.
11 This statement is simply irreconcilable with the evidence before 12 the court. As explained above: (1) the Fang transaction is not a 13 sale but a heavily subsidized transfer; and (2) the Examiner 14 contemplated by the Fangs will not result in anything close to 15 "full competition" with the Chronicle.

16 Indeed, DOJ has backed off its March 30 statement in its 17 post-trial submissions to the court, noting that it did not decide 18 whether the Examiner sale was below liquidation value and 19 determined only that the Fangs' Examiner "would adequately 20 substitute for any competition likely to be lost as a result" of 21 the sale of the Chronicle to Hearst. This latter position, of 22 course, admits of the possibility that the Chronicle/Hearst 23 transaction will result in no loss of competition.

24 The court is deeply troubled by DOJ's role in this case.
25 Both of DOJ's key positions, that the Hearst/Chronicle merger
26 created antitrust concerns and that the Fang transaction resolved 27 those concerns, are unsupported by legal analysis and inconsistent
28 with the evidence. DOJ has avoided explaining its apparent

1 standing to sue for injury as an advertiser or a potential
2 competitor in the publication of newspapers.

3 3. The 1965 joint operating agreement between Hearst and CPC
4 constituted a price fixing, profit pooling and market allocation 5 agreement in probable violation of the antitrust laws under then-6 existing market conditions.

7 4. The probable violation described above became exempt from 8 antitrust enforcement with enactment of the Newspaper Preservation 9 Act of 1970.

10 5. The NPA does not require publishers who once operate under 11 the NPA's exemption to continue their separate publications
12 indefinitely or for the contemplated period of the JOA.

13 6. Parties to a JOA may lawfully merge and cease publication
14 of one of the JOA newspapers if that newspaper meets the failing 15 company standard of Citizen Publishing Co v United States, 394 US
16 131 (1969). When that test is met, the parties to a JOA may 17 discontinue the failing publication and may dispose of the assets
18 associated with it; neither the NPA or any other antitrust law
19 requires the parties to ensure that some other competing
20 publication comes into existence; nor do JOA participants have a 21 legal obligation to spin off some of the JOA's assets to a third 22 party for purposes of establishing a competitor.

23 7. Merger of Hearst and CPC operations coupled with the 24 closure of the Examiner would not create a monopoly, substantially 25 lessen competition or unreasonably restrain trade. Accordingly, 26 the August 6 contract does not violate sections 1 or 2 of the 27 Sherman Act or section 7 of the Clayton Act.

28

1 8. Closure of the Examiner without a spin off of assets as 2 contemplated in the March 16 contract would increase allocative
3 efficiency in that it would afford the same outlet for advertisers
4 that both the Chronicle and Examiner now provide and conserve
5 substantial resources, while lessening the content choice available 6 to newspaper readers only negligibly.

7 9. The arrangements between Hearst and ExIn contemplated in 8 the March 16 contract appear inimical to competition and could 9 constitute a violation of the antitrust laws.

10 10. Plaintiff does not have standing to challenge this aspect 11 of the March 16 transaction. Plaintiff's standing is limited to 12 that of a consumer of newspaper news, features and opinion; his 13 alleged injury is the loss of an economically viable editorial
14 voice. With the court's conclusion that closure of the Examiner
15 may proceed without a sale to the Fang group or any other party
16 unwilling to pay at least liquidation value for Examiner assets, 17 such injury does not in this instance exist and plaintiff's cause 18 of action fails. In order to challenge the March 16 transaction on 19 the basis of possible anticompetitive effects, a plaintiff would 20 need standing as an advertiser in or competitor to Hearst or Fang 21 group publications, or both.

22 11. Although plaintiff did not prevail in obtaining the 23 relief he sought, his action has served a useful purpose in 24 bringing to light problematic conduct of the government and the 25 parties. The court will entertain a motion to award plaintiff for 26
27
28

1 his fees and costs of suit pursuant to sections 4 and 16 of the 2 Clayton Act, 15 USC §§ 15, 26.
